Today's deal features a declarer's falsehood. How should South play at trick one to mislead West? West leads his club king, and East drops his singleton five. Clearly, whether East has 5-3 or a singleton five, South doesn't want West to continue the suit. Two top clubs, a club ruff, and the diamond ace would lead to a swift one down. How does he discourage a club continuation? Many players would obfuscate by dropping the club 10. If West believes declarer's 10 to be singleton, he may try another suit. However, South's play of the club 10 should fool no one. If South really had the singleton 10, East would have 6-5-2. With those cards, why would East play the five instead of the deuce? A discerning West would brush aside the crude falsehood and continue in clubs. This would give the defenders the first four tricks, sending the game one down. If South plays a truthful deuce, it is more effective than a clumsy 10. Now West cannot tell if East has 10-6-5, or a singleton. And in view of dummy's clubs, West might switch suits, giving South his game. In summary, in similar situations, play a low card if you wish a shift. Play a high card if you wish a continuation.
